Spice Route Kitchen: the overall rating says 4.1 stars. This shows which dish is quietly slipping, and since when.

Sensitivity: 1.5

Minimum mentions per month: 6

Rating drop a manager would notice: 0.30 ★

Lower sensitivity warns sooner but may raise false alarms. Months with fewer mentions than the minimum are ignored. Every tab updates when you move these.

Radar: which dishes need attention today?

Read it: each row is a dish or service moment. The status compares its last 3 months with its own first 6 months. The line shows its sentiment over time. In the heatmap, red means guests are unhappy and green means happy; grey means too few mentions.

Do this: start with the red rows, then read the suggested next step.

Words used: Dish = something on the menu. Moment = part of the visit such as service speed or ambience. Baseline = how happy guests normally were in the first 6 months (scale: -1 angry to +1 delighted). Last 3 mo = the same score for the latest 3 months. Times mentioned = how many times guests talked about this dish or moment in all reviews, one count per sentence about it. More mentions means the score is more trustworthy.

Time machine: would this really have warned us early?

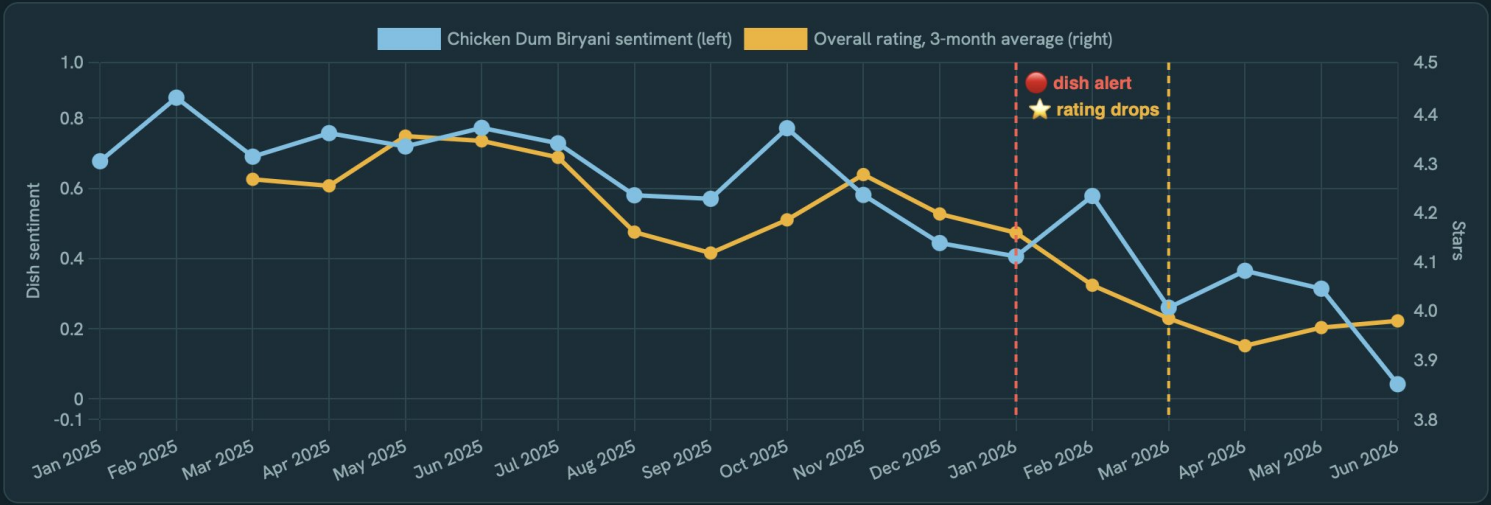

Read it: drag the month or press Play. You only see what a manager would have known at that point. The blue line is the dish, the amber line is the overall rating.

New: the AI predictive model below uses only the months up to the one you picked to forecast the next 3 months, with a likely range, the chance of an alert, and a backtest showing how accurate it has been.

Look for: the red line (dish alert) appearing before the amber line (rating visibly drops). The gap is the head start.

Try a review: see what a single star rating hides.

Read it: paste a review. The overall score blends everything, then DishRadar splits it by dish. This is a simplified version of the notebook's scorer.

Do this: write one review with a good dish and a bad one, then compare.

The biryani was dry and bland today, but the butter chicken was delicious. Service was painfully slow. Lovely ambience though.

A single overall score says -0.27, which hides the detail. DishRadar splits it into:

Chicken Dum Biryani · -0.70
"The biryani was dry and bland today,"

Butter Chicken · +0.54
"the butter chicken was delicious."

Service speed · -0.56
"Service was painfully slow."

Ambience · +0.59
"Lovely ambience though."
